Humans and the Environment

Big Era Five began with a sharp population decline that lasted from the third to the sixth centuries CE and that affected large areas of Afroeurasia. We do not entirely understand why this demographic downturn occurred, but it is likely associated with a number of factors. One was a cycle of climatic change that produced drier conditions and consequently declines in agricultural productivity, notably in irrigated river valleys. Another was outbreaks of infectious disease epidemics. The one that hit the Mediterranean region in the sixth century is known as Justinian's Plague after the famous Roman emperor of that period. Economic recession and epidemics disrupted established empires and states across Afroeurasia, and this helped open agrarian societies to recurring invasions and migrations of pastoral nomadic peoples from the Inner Eurasian steppes.
