Educational Philosophy

Having spent the past thirty-nine years in education I have decided that education is change. What kind of change? When I started as a teacher, it appeared our role was to prepare all children for college. For those who were not college material, we would suggest they go to vocational schools or get their high school diploma and go to work. We held parents to the task of discipline and expected them to support the schools. Sounded easy and simple then? Was this really an accurate picture? I do not believe so.

Education is the preparation of our children for a career. The career may include college or specialized training. It includes the skills needed for basic literacy, advanced training in the skills for a job and the professional training needed for more complex tasks. We need to provide an atmosphere where children can explore and develop their talents. We need a curriculum that is rigorous and challenging. A successful instructional program is one where there is strong leadership, an academic focus, quality teaching and a very rigorous curriculum. I will briefly elaborate on each of these.

Strong Leadership – A strong educational leader in a school is the key to progress, good supervision, and vision. I firmly believe the leader of tomorrow is one who will facilitate change, by enabling quality teachers to explore. The leaders of tomorrow will have to possess the skills expected in the business, counseling, and the education world. These will be those people who can handle and thrive on change. Recent research indicates that today's businesses must re-invent themselves every two to three years in order to survive. Our leaders must possess the vision to develop a program that enables students to live in this changing world.

Academic focus – A quality program for all student is one that provides a rigorous curriculum, clear expectations, alternative programs and methods for those in need, strong discipline, creativity, encouragement for exploration, and time on task for both teachers and students.

I really believe we can make our schools more effective if we look at the future as if it were today. We need to make decisions that prepare students today for the world we do not even know or possibly understand. We need to encourage our young people to explore, take risks, and develop the soft skills needed for their placement in the world of work. Employers throughout the Country agree that they can train an employee in the skills of a specific job.

They also agree that the thing they most need are employees who have the ability to get along with others, show up on time, complete tasks on their own, and have the ethics needed to be successful.

Quality teaching – teachers must be committed to the classroom. I always looked for the teacher who was a performer in the classroom, the person who would be there to challenge, entertain, question, and turn children loose to develop their ability to the fullest. I look for teachers who can adapt their instruction to the needs of a variety of learning styles and needs. I look for teachers who can bond with their students and take an interest in them. I look for the teacher who is open to communication with parents and wants and expects parent involvement. At the same time, these are the teachers who can compassionately work with parents who have a child at risk. I look for teachers who care, are tolerant and love the classroom.

Rigorous curriculum – A rigorous curriculum and instructional program provides for the whole student. It has a balance of academic, arts, and physical programs that develop the talents of the students. The rigorous curriculum builds on the framework started the year before and is sequential. Courses should be consistent with a college preparatory curriculum, a fine arts curriculum, and one that is flexible enough to prepare any student for continued education. Additionally, a comprehensive career education program must be provided. Readiness for the workforce is a key to a strong economy. Our schools need to help prepare them for the world of work.

I also believe a quality school must have extra-curricular experiences available for all ages. I support athletics; the arts and the social activities that help us develop that balance of academic, social and emotional growth in our young people.

I once talked with a group on educational issues; I said to them that if I ever wrote a book on education, the easy part was the title... "Schools Would Be Great If Kids Weren't Allowed." The point was that our schools would be easy to manage, have few academic problems and little controversy if kids didn't attend. The reality is that we are in the people business; working with the most precious resource we have, our children. The schools are the focal point in the development of the child in so many ways. We need to accept the challenge of educating today's young for the exciting world that awaits them.

I look forward to the new challenges that await me. I have the vision to look forward, take risks, make sound decisions and help build our community.
